

Ms. Eve Gomez came to the United States as a young girl, eager to learn so much about a strange country. She quickly adapted to the American culture and learned the English language. In her teenage years, she interpreted for her parents and siblings and took a liking to helping people because she desired to make a difference. She attended a private High School and paid for most of her school tuition. Ms. Gomez felt that it was important to receive a good education, so, at fifteen years old, she worked to remain in school and succeed in her education. She comes from a family of eight and is second to the youngest, so it was exceedingly difficult for her father to afford three of her school years due to a layoff in the steel mill in Gary, Indiana. In her junior year of high school, she started working at a night school with the children of migrant parents that were taking ESL classes (English as a Second Language). She felt happy to serve in the community as she helped tutor those children. After taking some time off from school, Ms. Gomez later worked her way through her college education. For over thirty-five years, Ms. Gomez has served in leadership service through activism, mentorship, and advocacy for the youth and elderly and participating in different committees with local universities and city colleges, and serve on boards with local, national, and international organizations. One of the organizations she serves on the board, she keeps close to her heart, and that is Rahab's Daughters. It is an international organization that promotes education and empowers survivors through rescue, refuge and rehabilitation.

With a passion for business and community, Eve Gómez is a successful business leader, media personality, motivational speaker, author and advocate for the youth and a social activist.
